Let's Start!

Let's review!

Learning Outcome

Describe emotions and feelings in present and past situations in spoken or written texts and in work and social contexts.

Ask your partner:

- When was the last time you had to say goodbye to a friend?
- Is there anything special you like to do before a friend or family member leaves?

Can Do Statements

- I can express concession, contrast or comparison.
- I can express uncertainty about past events.
- I can express annoyance about an action or an event in the present and in the past.

Let's Explore!

My father is really judgemental about my boyfriends.

* To be "judgemental" means to have an excessively critical point of view.

Instructions: Read the text aloud.

Vanessa: Wow. Amy. You're taking a lot of stuff to Africa. You may have been right Peter, the difference between men and women is luggage.

Amy: Peter! You said that? You can be so insensitive. You could at least think about other people's feelings once.

Peter: Could you not be so judgemental all the time? Must you always talk like that?

Vanessa: Alright! Alright. You two are adorable. You might have gotten me once, but unlike some people I know, you can't fool me twice. Why so much stuff?

Peter: Because I'm going with her on her spectacular getaway to Africa.

Vanessa: What? You might have let me know!

Peter: We are telling you now.

Vanessa: How? You couldn't have had enough time.

Amy: We talked to Candice about it. She said whereas last time I was extremely busy, this time will be more supervisory in nature, so I'll have more free time than on my last trip.

Vanessa: What about tickets?

Amy: There were plenty of seats and even though we won't be sitting together, we're booked on the same flight.

Vanessa: What about a visa?

Peter: Americans might have needed a visa in the past, but now you don't if you are staying less than 90 days.

Vanessa: And vaccinations?

Amy: Lesotho might have had a yellow fever problem before, but now it's safe.

Vanessa: It seems much more convenient than last time.

Amy: A little bit.

Peter: Well, we are heading to the airport now. We don't want to be held up in traffic.

Vanessa: Send me a postcard? Would that be too much to ask?

Peter: No problem. Do you want to share a cab?

Vanessa: No thanks.

Amy: Bye.

Peter: Bye.

Amy: Are you as excited as I am?

Peter: I'm super excited. Oh wait. I'm going into O'Malley's to say hello to someone. I'll be right back.

Amy: You may do as you please.

Peter: Hey, John.

John: Peter. Hey! Is Vanessa with you?

Peter: Uh. Sadly, no. My girlfriend and I are traipsing off to Africa.

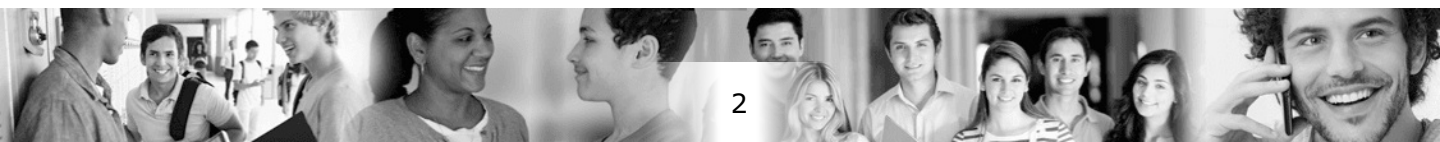

John: Africa. Wow. Good for you.

Peter: I just wanted to say hello and wish you luck.

John: Thank you Peter. You too.

John: Well, John. As you've made your bed, you might as well lie in it.

Vanessa: Ready to roll the dice just one more time?

Learning Points

Adverbial Clauses: Concession/Contrast and Comparison

Let's review the different ways you can add diversity in the way you speak and write. You can use adverbial clauses to add detail to your descriptions of people, events and things.

1. You use concession or contrast clauses to express an idea that suggests the opposite of the main part of the sentence. They are useful in both writing and speaking since they make your language more dynamic and diverse. You introduce concession or contrast clauses with conjunctions like although, though, even though, whereas, while and even if.

For example:

Whereas last time our schedule was quite busy, this time it will be much easier.

Even though we won't be sitting together, we are booked on the same flights.

2. You can use adverbial clauses of comparison to describe manner (the way in which someone does something). You introduce the comparative clause with the relative adverb as.

For example:

As you've made your bed, you might as well lie in it. This expression means that if you make a decision, you will have to accept the consequences.

It ended as I expected.

3. You can use adverbial clauses of comparison to describe degree (when you want to say how much more something or someone is compared to something or someone else). You introduce adverbial clauses of comparison of degree with the subordinating conjunction than, or by the relative adverb as.

For example:

I will have more free time than on my last trip.

Are you as excited as I am?

Examples:

- I will have more free time than on my last trip.
- Are you as excited as I am?
- It seems much more convenient than last time.
- You may do as you please.
- Whereas last time I was extremely busy, this time will be more supervisory in nature.

Modals to Express Annoyance in the Present and in the Past

You use modals in their present and past forms to express annoyance about a situation or to make a critical comment.

Learning Points

When you want to express annoyance and criticism about the past, you can use modals such as could, might, should, ought to, and would + have + the past participle of the verb. This structure adds meaning to the main verb and can convey annoyance when you use them properly. Remember, when you talk about annoyance in the past, you use the modal + have + past participle.

Take a look at the chart below.

Tense		Use/Meaning	Example
Present	can or would	To express annoyance.	You can be so insensitive. Would that be asking too much?
Present	could or might	To express annoyance when someone doesn't do something.	She might have let me know when she's going to fly to Africa for a week. You could at least think about other people's feelings once.
Past	could have , might have or would have	To make a critical comment.	You could have told me about that guy in New York. He might have offered to pay. I would have said something different.

Notice that the meaning of those expressions depends on the right context and tone of voice.

For example:

I took Carol out to dinner last night, because it was her birthday. I didn't tell her I got fired one week ago. She might have offered to pay.

In this sentence, the speaker does not express annoyance; he is expressing a possibility.

Examples:

- Could you not be so judgmental all the time?
- Must you always talk like that?
- You might have let me know!
- Would that be too much to ask?
